Journalism can be a successful engine of democracy when facts can be reported objectively without fear or favor. Yet, we now hear public claims of "fake news" and, in some cases, the media is threatened with revised libel laws or the revocation of broadcast licenses. All of this is taking place at a time when journalists and citizens have an unprecedented ability to reach a wide audience and ready access to policymakers' unfiltered viewpoints through social media. How do each of these conditions affect journalism? How should the media respond? Is freedom of the press being threatened or more expansive than ever before?

FCC Commissioner Jessica Rosenworcel will give introductory remarks prior to the panel discussion.
